ENRICHED BY A PANTHER

In a large mining town in the far west there lives George Randolf, a mining king, who by nature is as stern and arbitrary as men are apt to be when they acquire sudden riches. In addition to the person of his daughter Bessle, as of his master, while the other lay dead sweet a seventeen-year-old maiden as ever lived.

Pretty Bessie did not lack for lovers, and quite as naturally the favored one ed to.

Clyde Brown was frank spoken, with heart, and little else. "Why, Elizabeth"—her father always called her that when displeased-"how can you forget that we are descended from the Randolfs of Virginia? Just a little longer, daughter—a year or two at the most-and we will go east and live as other people do. Then my jewel may find a worthy setting."

"I want no one but Clyde, papa," protested Bessie tearfully. But tears made no impression upon the hard heart of George Randolf. However, he condescended to give a conditional consent to their union-such an absurd condition that people laughed and shook their heads and Bessie's merry COLO. face grew grave.

"When you can show the possession of $100,000 you can have her," he said grimly, in answer to Clyde Browne's manly petition. "Until then I'll hear no more about it."

"You can never do it," sobbed Bessie when they stood alone in the moonlight by the road a few moments later, while her father watched angrily from the window. "Fortunes are wonderfully made in these mines sometimes, but none will fall to us."

"Don't be discouraged, my precious Queen Bess," Clyde returned, with all a lover's unreasoning fondness. "Only trust in me through all and wait for me, no matter what may happen. Will you promise me that?"

"Indeed I will, dearest! You knew murmured. "But do not try me too much, for father is as hard as a rock." "I must go away for awhile, my darling. Somewhere in yonder endless chain of mountains a fortune is waiting for me. I feel it-I know it as well as if it were already in my grasp," he answered, in solemn earnestness.

"God grant that it may be so," she And then she walked slowly to the house, to her father's great relief. The next morning Clyde left the town.

For some time the prize which he sought cluded him, but it came to him at last in a strange manner.

One day, after following the course of a noisy, shallow stream into a marrow near the water. The dogs whined uneasily and sniffed at a hole among the roots of the tree, but he called them away and went on building a fire to cook supper from the loose wood and brauches around. "Now that the fire is ready," he mused aloud, "I wonder if I'll find any game hereabout." As if in answer, a half grown deer came down to the stream on the opposite bank not many rods away.

It stopped, with one foot upraised, and looked at the dogs with startled eyes; but the next instant the report of Clyde's rifle rang out, the deer leaped into the air, sprang forward and fell into the stream, from which it was soon dragged by the dogs. But the echoes made by the report had not died out among the hills before an-

It was the scream of an angry panther from the mountain behind him, and it the right, and yet another far down the valley on the left.

Clyde heaped the dry limbs upon the fire, and the dogs, usually as brave as Hons, whined piteously as they skulked close to his feet. He waited in breathless anxiety for everal minutes, but could hear nothing except the crackling of the fire, which now threw a wide circle of light, and the night wind among the trees. Soon, following a magnetism which he could not account for, he fixed his gaze upon a tall tree near the base of the mountain and encountered the glare of two fierce, yellow eyes.

A panther was crouching there upon a long limb, every nerve of his body in motion as he prepared for the fatal spring.

To aim and fire at him was the impulse of a second, and the tawny brute sprang outward with a snarl of rage and pain, and fell squarely into the fire. There was an unearthly shrick, a smell of burning hair, a shower of coals and lighted wood, then the brute stood wounded and blinded near the tree. "At him, boys; at him!" cried Clyde, And the dogs closed on him, but, wounded as he was, he was more than a match for them. He killed one and sent the others howling to a safe distance before their master could surely aim the second bullet, which quieted him. He was not an matant too soon, however, for there came another terrific scream, this time from the tree directly over his head.

"I'm ready for you now!" he cried, coolly sighting another panther directly between the scintillating eyes. He fired and sprang saide, while the lot here the night."

animal fell, struck the ground with a heavy thud, clawed the earth and air convolutely for a few seconds and then | munter here a nicht." lay quite still.

"This is getting interesting," muttered Clyde grimly eying the two huge, tawny New Mexico bodies, the dead dog and the skulking living ones, while he threw fresh wood upon the scattered every direction.

"Meow! Meow! Sct-t-t!" He turned sharply to see the heads of two panther cubs thrust out of the hole near the tree, their ears laid close to their round heads and their eyes sweeping the scene in fierce inquiry, "Ha, ha! A regular family party I've stumbled on," laughed Clyde. "S-s-s!

Seek 'em boys!" And the dogs pulled one kitten out to his death, while the other scrambled back in the hole. Suddenly there was a slight noise in the edge of the forest, and two half grown pauthers came cautiously into the circle of the light, sniffing the air unensily and evidently afraid of a trap.

The smell of the scorched hair and the blinding glare of the fire puzzled them. But Clyde did not wait for them to become satisfied of the safety of an attack. He fired two shots in quick succession, killing one animal and badly wounding the other, which the dogs attacked at once When the sharp, short fight was over, his gold he possessed a rare treasure in one dog limped back to receive the praise beside its dead foe. "You and I are alone now, Brave, my boy," said his master, patting the dog's head, "Well, when daylight comes we'll see after that little varmint in the

The night passed without further moan honest, manly face, a true, loving lestation, but Clyde kept the fire burning brightly while he busied himself in skinning three of the panthers—the one which had sprung into the fire being worthless. Two were monstrous brutes, male and female, evidently the parents of the smaller pair as well as the kittens. After a generous breakfast of roasted venison he enlarged the hole with his pick and shovel, and, after examining his revolvers, crept in cauticusty with a lighted torch, while the dog remained outside protesting against such foolhardy conduct by dismal yelps and

He soon discovered and killed the kitten, but could find no signs of any more. The floor of the cave was covered with bones, and a neatly made nest of sticks and leaves was in one corner.

But Clyde did not notice these; he was examining the rocky sides, which were of a peculiar veined grayish stone. There was a smile of satisfaction on his face when he had finished this examination, and when he crept forth into daylight again he muttered, tweaking Brave's ears until the dog yelped in pain collectantly. "If that mine is worth $100,000 you can have her, for a Randolf never goes back on his word." That was only a year ago, and the mine has already netted its owner over Winter in Italy.

In Italy in the winter the Italians spread rugs over their floors, hang tapestries upon their walls, pile cushions everywhere, and carpet their sofas with long baired skins; this they call warmth. But a fireless room, with the thermometer on its walls standing at 35 degs. is not warm, no matter how many cushions you may put into it; and one hates to believe, too, that necessary accompaniments of health are roughened faces and frest litten noses and the extreme ugliness of hands swollen and rod .- Constance F.
